ElevenLabs – Growth Marketing (Consumer App Channels)

I'm reaching out as someone who has spent the last several years building exactly the kind of partnership and growth systems that a company scaling a new consumer app needs.

My name is James. I'm a growth and GTM operator with 7+ years of hands-on experience across B2B, SaaS, and consumer-facing companies in Africa, North America, and Europe. A recurring pattern in my work: I get handed a partnership or channel that shows early promise, and my job is to figure out whether it's actually working and turn it into something repeatable, not just measure it after the fact.

At Reform, that meant taking one integration partnership (Zuko) and building it into 11% of new pipeline, then generalizing what worked into a creator/agency incentive framework and co-marketing playbook other partners could plug into. At FunnelEnvy, partnership and ABM work drove 14% of new qualified pipeline, backed by a cross-brand attribution stack I built specifically because single-channel reporting kept overstating what actually moved the number.

I want to be direct about a gap: the JD asks for 10+ years, I have 7+. And my partnership work has been B2B, not the consumer/B2C loyalty, retail, and OOH formats this role names. What transfers is the underlying discipline: I treat a partnership as a hypothesis that needs proving, and I build the measurement into the deal before calling anything a win. That's the same instinct I'd bring to figuring out which of ElevenReader's existing partnerships (the celebrity voice licensing, the telecom and bank bundling) are actually converting, before chasing the categories still unexplored.

I do my best work at the intersection of partnerships, creative, and measurement. I don't see them as separate jobs handed to different people. In ElevenReader's context, that means:

- Auditing what's already working in the existing telecom, bank, and celebrity-voice partnerships before assuming new categories (retail, education, travel) need a different playbook.
- Building a repeatable partnership structure from what's proven, the same move I made at Reform with the Zuko partnership.
- Insisting on an incrementality read, not just attribution, before calling a co-marketing launch a success. I did similar work at CIL, where paid acquisition ran at 2-3x ROAS with CAC under $0.50, numbers I could defend because the measurement stack was built before the campaigns launched.
- Writing the campaign and reading the report on it myself, rather than handing the analysis to someone else after the creative ships.

I care more about building the system that tells you which activations are worth repeating than about running isolated ones.

Documentation has always been part of how I work. I write Marketing In Action (newsletter.marketinginaction.xyz), a newsletter where I publish applied GTM and growth systems rather than theory, currently at 5,000+ subscribers with a 47% average open rate. I also build in public: github.com/realjaymes/marketingagentskills is a repo of the marketing skills I run on Claude Code day to day, which matches how ElevenLabs describes its own operating culture, using AI to move faster across the whole company, not just engineering.

If it's useful, I could put together a short breakdown of how I'd approach auditing the existing partnership channels in the first 30 days.

Thank you for taking the time to read this.

James

P.S. I've created a portfolio focused on this role at jamespraise.xyz/work/elevenlabs.