Homa – Founding Marketer

Arman,

Homa already has the start of a creator program. Your referral page gives a buyer an extra $500 credit at closing when they come through someone's link. What's missing is the program around it: a way to join, a brief on what to say, and tracking from each link to a booked home tour.

I've built that kind of channel from nothing before. At Reform, a form builder for marketing teams, I set up the affiliate program on PartnerStack, covering the recruiting, the incentives, the tracking and the assets partners used. A co-marketing partnership I ran there with Zuko, a form analytics company, brought in 11% of new pipeline. At Cecure Intelligence, a training company launching across five African countries, creator and influencer partnerships were part of an acquisition mix that kept the cost per customer under $0.50.

I've also been the creator. My newsletter sells sponsored showcases to software companies. One for Forage Mail, an AI email assistant, opened at 36% to 41% and brought in more than a dozen verified trial sign-ups. So I've seen a creator deal from both sides.

Creator deals in real estate need one extra step. Paying a creator per tour or per closing can break the federal rules on referral fees. I'd pay creators flat rates for content and keep the $500 credit with the buyer, with your broker and counsel signing off first.

I live in Lagos, seven hours ahead of Austin, and I'm open to employee, contractor or Employer of Record terms. I can start immediately.

I've started the work, and I'd like to talk through what comes next.

James Praise

P.S. I wrote the first version of Homa's creator and partner plan, measured on booked tours: https://jamespraise.xyz/work/homa/