Aiven – Director of Revenue Marketing

When IBM bought Confluent, Aiven gave Kafka buyers a migration page, a comparison, a live webinar and a message ad from Conor Forde offering months of free service. I read all of it this week because I wanted to see how your team responds when a market moves.

Postgres went through the same kind of change in 2025. Databricks bought Neon and Snowflake bought Crunchy Data. I checked your sitemap and your LinkedIn ads, and I could not find a matching campaign. So I wrote one, with the evidence, a page brief, a message ad and a table for routing leads. It's at jamespraise.xyz/work/aiven/proof.

Those two acquisitions are useful for this job because the buyers differ. Neon's plans suit a developer starting alone. Crunchy Data lists healthcare, government and financial services. One event could feed both your self-serve signups and your sales pipeline, provided Growth and Sales agree who gets which lead.

I have worked both funnels. At Reform, I repositioned the product for technical and business buyers. Trial activation rose 34%, trial-to-paid conversion rose 21%, and the competitor pages I launched produced 19% more decision-stage leads. At FunnelEnvy, qualified enterprise leads grew 40% quarter over quarter and account-based marketing lifted enterprise meetings 31%. Outbound I ran for five client accounts averaged $151,962 in pipeline created per client each month. As Chief Revenue Officer at Cecure Intelligence, a cloud solutions provider partnered with AWS, Google and Microsoft, I led go-to-market teams across five African countries.

I work from Lagos. Would a remote contractor or employer of record arrangement be possible for this role?

I'd like your feedback on the plan.
