Etiya – Product Marketing Manager

Dear Etiya Product Marketing team,

The North American half of this role is work I already do. Most of my product marketing has been written for North American business buyers from Lagos, at Reform, FunnelEnvy and Distrobird. I have also run the enterprise side: a sales-led motion at Cecure Intelligence across Sub-Saharan Africa, with Amazon Web Services, Google and Microsoft as partners, that produced 1,646 marketing qualified leads, 629 demos and $3.4M in open pipeline.

Etiya's North American references need careful ordering. Videotron, Freedom Mobile and Fizz are the brands in front, and since April Quebecor has owned 70% of Etiya. Buyers at other operators will ask whether that is a customer story or a parent running its own systems. I would build the proof in a ladder. Fizz launching in 10 months comes first, then Bouygues Telecom choosing Etiya to bring three brands onto one platform, and last the group story told as a strength of the model. I drafted the reference ladder and put it on a page for you.

At Reform I repositioned a form builder for US marketers and lifted trial activation 34%. I also built the Feature Launch Plan Framework that raised adoption of new features 26% within 90 days. The same method suits a portfolio of thirteen products: one message per operator problem, one set of proof behind it, and a review with product and sales before anything ships.

Etiya sells agentic AI, and I build with it every day. I have made 81 agent skills for my own marketing and publish 34 of them on GitHub, so a claim about what an agent did and how it was measured is a conversation I can have with your engineers.

Lagos is level with Amsterdam and two hours behind Istanbul, so I overlap with your team for a full working day. I would like to hear which North American deals Etiya is winning and losing today.
