Kredete – Head of Marketing, Brand and Product Growth

Kredete's next stage needs someone who has built a marketing function from nothing in African fintech, and that is the job I keep getting hired to do. At Bujeti (YC W23), I set up growth and marketing as its first owner and generated 1,331 marketing qualified leads in six months, with new B2B customers up 500% in Q1 2024. At Cecure Intelligence, I launched an academy across Nigeria, Ghana, Kenya, Rwanda and Angola that reached 10,000+ users in its first cohort at under $0.50 per customer, while the B2B side carried $3.4M in open deals.

I spent some time on kredete.io before writing this. In one scroll, the homepage covers transfers, Visa cards, credit, savings, travel, stocks and a prediction market. The headline rotates through six verbs in the same spot (move, spend, receive, save, grow, trade), and the user count reads 5 million in one section and 6M+ two sections later. That happens when a product portfolio grows faster than anyone decides which product leads for which audience. With Gravv's business rails now inside Kredete, businesses and banking partners need that decision too. I'd start there, with one story for diaspora senders, one for business buyers, and corridor pages that show the rate and fee a sender compares.

Acquisition needs the same discipline. For my own business, I built a paid-acquisition system that judges every campaign on backend sales, not the ad platform's report. It caught Meta crediting one product with another's sales, and showed a cold campaign was losing buyers at checkout. I'd report Kredete's acquisition cost by corridor and product the same way before the budget scales.

I live in Lagos, and I write every week for a newsletter audience that is 46% Nigerian and 32% US-based. That is close to the corridor Kredete grew up on. I've also run media relations and funding announcements before, at Bujeti and at Bento, so the licences, markets and raises Kredete announces next would each go out on the same story.

I'd like to talk about what the first ninety days would look like.

James Praise

P.S. I've drafted a message hierarchy for Kredete, with one story for diaspora senders and one for business buyers, at jamespraise.xyz/work/kredete.