Prerender (saas.group) – Product Marketing Manager

Prerender is in the middle of a category move, and repositioning a product into a new category is work I've already done. At Reform, I took a general-purpose form builder and repositioned it around lead conversion. Once the story held from the homepage to the sales deck, trial activation rose 34%.

The move here is bigger. Prerender built its name on getting JavaScript pages read by Google, and Google no longer recommends dynamic rendering. The crawlers behind ChatGPT, Claude and Perplexity don't run JavaScript at all, so the same pages are blank to them. That gives buyers a stronger reason to choose Prerender than the original one, but only if the story reaches the person who owns the budget. A technical SEO understands renders. A CMO needs to see revenue at risk.

I know both buyers. At Distrobird I ran inbound and SEO and ranked for 3,000+ competitive keywords in three months, so the technical evaluation is familiar ground. On my own sites I audit for AI answer engines as a routine step, using an agent skill I built for it. Across B2B and SaaS roles, my work has contributed to more than $10M in qualified pipeline, mostly by turning product detail into a business case.

I built one example for you: a live demo of an AI and Brand Visibility Panel, the customer deck that sells it and the go-to-market plan behind it, all at jamespraise.xyz/work/prerender. I built the demo myself with no engineering help. That's how I'd want to work with your team: when sales needs a calculator or a demo, I can build it.
