Teramind – Senior Product Marketing Manager

Hi Teramind team,

The job this role describes, taking a product that sells to more than one buyer and making each of them hear only their own story, is work I've done before. A pattern in my career is being handed a messy positioning problem and turning it into something a sales team can repeat on a call.

At Reform, I repositioned a general-purpose form builder around one buyer and rebuilt the pages behind it. Trial activation rose 34%, and the competitor pages I built produced 19% more decision-stage leads. At Bento Africa, an HR and payroll SaaS in four countries, I ran product marketing and the lead scoring behind a 50% rise in sales-qualified leads. The part of my background I'd lean on most here is the revenue seat. I went from sales manager to Chief Revenue Officer at CIL in under a year, so I write battlecards and objection guides for the rep who has to use them the same afternoon.

Before applying, I read Teramind the way a buyer would. The March launch says governed AI gives companies "the confidence to say yes." The Shadow AI Report says the sanctioned tool is the risk. The AI Governance page leads with unsanctioned apps as the new insider threat. All three are true, but they split further down the funnel: pricing lists Agentic AI Governance inside a plan described as productivity optimization, and the ChatGPT DLP page closes on unproductive work time. I drafted how I'd give each buyer one track, along with a problem-led demo opening and a Purview battlecard built from Microsoft's own documentation.

I haven't worked inside a cybersecurity company. What I bring is time in adjacent B2B SaaS, including HR tech, plus a habit of learning a category from its buyers and competitors before writing a word about it, which is how the brief above was built.

I'd like to talk about which of those AI stories your closed-won deals are already telling.
