Improbable – Product Marketing Manager, Prediction Markets

I'm reaching out as someone who has spent the last several years resolving positioning questions a company hasn't fully answered yet, then building the story and the competitive frame around the answer.

My name is James. I'm a product marketing operator with 7+ years of hands-on experience across B2B, SaaS, and consumer-facing companies in Africa, North America, and Europe. Across that work, I've contributed to over $10M in qualified pipeline and founded Marketing In Action, a community and academy platform I grew from zero to 5,000+ subscribers through peer referral and word of mouth.

This role needs someone who can name an unresolved positioning question and build the frame around it. I published a teardown of how Binance shows up in search and AI answers across six African markets in four languages, and I did the same close reading of Prophecy Social. I found one specific: PST is explicitly soulbound, it can't be transferred, traded, or sold, which makes Prophecy Social a free-to-play engagement game, not a real-money prediction market. But nowhere across the homepage, the blog posts, or the docs does Prophecy Social compare itself to Polymarket or Kalshi, the category's real-money reference points anyone crypto-native will reach for by default. That's a genuine, unresolved tension between what the product is and what its category name signals.

At Reform, I repositioned a technical product for an audience split between technical and business buyers, and trial activation rose 34%. At Hank Robotics, I built positioning from scratch for a category with no existing market narrative, and marketing qualified leads (MQLs) grew 1,900% in 3 months.

I put together a short brief naming the game-versus-market tension and proposing the frame that resolves it.

Thank you for taking the time to read this.

James
